Editor of The Times-Dispatch:
Sir.—Judge Christian's decision in Yoder's case will likely rulse some very interesting fundamental questions that have not yet been passed upon by the Court of Appenis. The State government is the creature of the Constitutional Convention. It created three co-ordinate branches—the legislative, the j. dichal and the executive. Each has its own sphere. Neither has any "inherent" right to do anything, and can only exercise such powers within its sphere as the Constitution permits by special grant, or fails to prohibit. The judiciary is in no sense superior to the others, as its powers are derived from the same source and its limitations are defined by the same rules of construction as obtain in the other cases. In the absence of constitutional restrictions, it may exercise, under the common law, such powers carry out the necessary to effectively carry out the purpose of its creation, but when the Constitution speaks, the common law must remain silent, and the judiciary must confine its acts to those things within the constitutional limitations, or become itself a violator of the law. The Virginia Constitution, section 63, says: "The General Assembly may regulate the exercise by courts of the right to punish for contempt."

It goes further in the schedule, and provided in section 1: "The common law and the statute laws in force at the time this Constitution goes into effect, so far as not repugnant thereto or repealed thereby, shall remain in force until they expire by their own limitation, or are aliened or repealed by the General Assembly."
